I blew in the A. D.'s nickel on a crosstown enr and got back to the little aquare. There was another organ grinder there grinding out eoon songs, to which other pickaninnies danced. But pary a little white bundle of fluff caught linid of my hand. I walked that aquara till my feet were sore. It was hot. My throat was parched. I was ry. My head ached, I was hope-And yet I just couldn't give It up. had asked so many children and nurse naids whether they'd heard of the haby lost that morning and brought back by an officer, that they began to look at me as though I was not quite right in The maids grabbed the children if they started to come near me and the children stared at me with big round eyes, as though they'd been told was an ngre who might eat them.

I was inungry enough to. The little fruit stand at the entrance had a fascin ation for me. I found myself there time and again, till I got afraid I might actually try to get off with a peach or bunch of grapes. That thought haunted me. Fancy Nance Olden starved and blundering into the cheapest and most easily detected species of thieving! I suppose great generals in their hour of defeat imagine themselves doing the feeblest, foolishest things. As I sat there on the bench, gazing before me, i saw the whole thing-Nancy Olden after all her bragging, her skirmishing her hairbreadth scapes and successes arrested in broad daylight and before witnesses for having stolen a cool, we bunch of grapes, worth a nickel, for her hot, dry, hungering throat! I saw the policeman that'd do it; he looked like that Sergeaut Mulfill I met 'way way back in Latimer's garden. I saw the officer that'd receive me; he had for me to the Manhattan. I saw the woman jailer-oh, she was the A. D. all right, who'd receive me without tha slightest emotion, show me to a cell and lock the door, as eaim, as little triumphant or affected, as though I hadn't once outwitted that cleverest of creaturesand outwitted myself in forestalling her.
